The pari passu principle in loan transactions

An important, yet undervalued principle in loan transactions is the pari passu principle. The principle concerns the ranking of lenders' claims and concomitant security rights in loan transactions. In this article, the meaning and scope of the pari passu principle in loan transactions is discussed.

Our courts have interpreted the term pari passu to mean equally and without preference. The judgments in Nulliah v Harper 1930 AD 141, Donaldson Investments (Pty) Ltd v Anglo-Transvaal Collieries 1979 (3) SA 713 (W) and Absa Bank Ltd v Moore and Another 2017 (1) SA 255 (CC) are some of the judgments that deal with the pari passu principle.

In a typical loan transaction,[1] the borrower usually makes a representation that its obligations to repay that loan, rank at least pari passu with the claims of all its other unsecured and unsubordinated creditors, except for obligations mandatorily preferred by law applying to companies generally. The borrower thereby effectively represents that, in the case of an unsecured loan,[2] the lender's loan will rank equally and without preference to other loans and will be repaid rateably along side all its other debt, with the exception that the law may determine a different order for the ranking of claims. A borrower making such a representation ought to satisfy itself that this is in fact the case, and that other lenders do not enjoy preferential payment rights. Such a pari passu clause gives the lender the comfort that legally, there is a parity of claims, and that no claim will be paid in preference to its claim.

There is usually a further representation by the borrower that any security provided by the borrower or any other obligor, has or will have the ranking in priority expressed in the security documents, or first ranking priority, and it is not subject to any prior ranking or pari passu ranked security. The borrower thereby represents that the security has the ranking, or status in law, that the borrower professes it has, including that it does not rank equally and without preference to other security rights, that is, it ranks ahead of other security. Similarly, a borrower making such a representation ought to satisfy itself that this is in fact the case, and that other lenders do not enjoy preferential security rights. The pari passu clause in the context of security gives the lender the comfort that legally, the security rights have the ranking that the borrower represents they have.

[2] A similar representation is usually made in respect of loans for which security is given.

When payment rights are enforced

The recommended due diligence investigation by borrowers as to the legal and factual correctness of their pari passu representations is especially necessary for borrowers who have taken out many loans with different lenders. It is submitted that the pari passu representation in respect of both loans and security rights ceases to be factually true and loses its value at the point in time when an aggrieved lender successfully enforces its payment rights (whether pursuant to a contractual demand with which the borrower complies or by obtaining a court order) against a borrower because it defaulted on its loan repayment obligations as the aggrieved lender's loan will be repaid ahead of any other unpaid loans.

The taking of security establishes a priority of claims as between lenders and appears practically to render the pari passu clause in respect of loans somewhat oblique on the borrower's insolvency as between secured lenders and unsecured lenders. The reason is that on the borrower's insolvency, the lenders that hold security as contemplated in the Insolvency Act 24 of 1936 (Insolvency Act), will be repaid first from the proceeds of the sale of the assets over which security is held before preferent creditors and concurrent creditors are paid. In these circumstances, there will be no payment rights or security rights that rank equally and without preference. It has been held in English law that the pari passu clause applies on the borrower's insolvency, not before,[3] and that it is consequently incorrect to interpret the clause as meaning that the borrower is prevented from making payments to another creditor before the advent of its insolvency, unless the borrower simultaneously pays the lender whose facility agreement contains a pari passu clause.[4]

The pari passu representation in respect of both loans and security rights may be framed as a repeating representation, which is designed to ensure that certain basic facts relating to the pari passu ranking of the loan repayment obligations and the related security rights, remain as they originally were.[5] Repeating representations are typically required to be true on each draw down date of the facility and on the first day of each interest period. It is for this reason that a pari passu repeating representation applies both prior to, and on, the borrower's insolvency.[6]

[3] Assuming the clause is worded as described in the third paragraph of this article.

[5] S Wright The Handbook of International Loan Documentation 2 ed (Palgrave Macmillan, 2014).
[6] Whether that means that the borrower is prevented from making payments to another creditor before the advent of its insolvency unless the borrower simultaneously pays the lender whose facility agreement contains a pari passu clause is an open question to be decided by our courts.

The borrower will commit an event of default under the facility agreement if its pari passu representation in respect of the loan or security rights ceases to be true in any of the abovementioned or other circumstances.[7]

An interesting legal question is whether lenders who each hold different forms of security rights, such as, for example, bonds, cessions in securitatem debiti, guarantees (a form of quasi security as it is not mentioned in the definition of security in section 2 of the Insolvency Act) and pledges, can be said to hold pari passu security as between or amongst each other. It is submitted that each form of security will need to be assessed and compared to the other forms of security in order to determine its relative ranking as against the other security, so as to arrive at a legally defensible answer. Considerations when making such a determination may include, amongst others, the legal structure and substance of the security, the ease or difficulty of enforcing the security and the lenders' respective legal positions on the borrower's insolvency.
